How is your car performing? Can it still hold a headlight? Does it roar as it goes down the hill? It all matters, particularly in winter, when lighting conditions are bad. There are a number of easy ways to check the health of your headlight bulbs. But, if the headlight is on at a highway speed, your chances of rolling over are higher than at a stop light. Avoid rolling over — or being the cause of a rollover — by checking the function of your headlights. Here are a few safety tips for winter driving: Put the car in neutral. The vehicle speed will not be high enough to cause a rollover. Check the readout on the dashboard for the light level. This can indicate how bright the lights are. It is best to check the headlight bulbs in the AM or PM. Use low beams during the day. This will reduce the headlight dazzle and glare. Adjust the headlights. If the lenses are dirty or cracked, get a new pair of headlights at the local auto parts store. Adjust the headlight focus. Check that the headlight is focused where you need to be to avoid the risk of hitting the car in front of you. The headlights may need to be adjusted. If the dashboard gauge is not working, the driver can also use the headlights to check how the lights are focusing. Check the adjusting grip. The headlight adjustment screws can get loose over time. Consider getting a new set of headlights that have an adjusting grip. Learn more by visiting Ready for the winter driving season? Tip 10: Check the lights Check your headlights before driving at nighttime, so you can stay safe. Although your car may still be able to turn on the headlights during the day, the use of headlights during the day can damage both the lamps and windshield. It is best to use them only at nighttime. Before leaving your car unattended, check the bulbs on both the right and the left sides of the vehicle. If you are dealing with an older vehicle, it is important to replace the headlight bulbs, as the bulbs become brittle and can break if they are not replaced frequently. Tips for a safe winter driving season If you are going to spend the night alone, make sure that your car has enough gas, so that you won't have to rely on your backup system. Consider taking a trip with a friend or family member during the day and leaving the vehicle
